

Naming racism is a critical first step in the process of anti-racism. It is a process that involves identifying and naming the ways in which racism is embedded in our society, our institutions, and our everyday lives. This process is not always easy, but it is essential for us to move forward in a more just and equitable world. In this article, we explore the importance of naming racism and the challenges that we face in doing so. We also discuss some strategies for how we can begin to name racism in our own lives and in our communities.

SETTING THE AGENDA FOR ANTI-RACISM

The American Public Health Association (APHA) has a long history of leadership in the field of public health. In 2015-2016, the organization's National Center for Community Health Promotion and Practice (NCHPP) published a report titled "Setting the Agenda for Anti-Racism in Public Health Practice." This report was a landmark document that brought the issue of racism to the forefront of public health practice. It identified the ways in which racism is embedded in our society and our institutions, and it provided a framework for how we can begin to address these issues. The report was a call to action for public health practitioners to work together to create a more just and equitable world for all.

NAMING RACISM

Racism is a complex and multifaceted phenomenon that has shaped our society in profound ways. It is a system of power and privilege that is embedded in our laws, our institutions, and our everyday lives. Naming racism is a critical first step in the process of anti-racism. It is a process that involves identifying and naming the ways in which racism is embedded in our society, our institutions, and our everyday lives. This process is not always easy, but it is essential for us to move forward in a more just and equitable world. In this article, we explore the importance of naming racism and the challenges that we face in doing so. We also discuss some strategies for how we can begin to name racism in our own lives and in our communities.
